It led to the execution of nine student leaders and more than 1,200 students were sent to concentration camps.  In November 1989, a commemorative march was held to mark the 50th anniversary of the student revolt. The authorities tried to suppress the march, which only led to an avalanche of popular protests in Czech and Slovak cities. In the following days, the protests turned into non-violent strikes, involving first students and later all citizens of Czechoslovakia.  This event became known as the Velvet Revolution and marked the beginning of the end of the communist regime that had ruled the country for more than forty years. Václav Havel was elected president.

Sporck Palace is an originally Neo-classicist building built at the end of the 18th century was radically rebuilt in the 1920s, especially by architect Josef Gočár. The present architectural concept is made by Stanislav Fiala. Červený Jelen pub was open in the space of the former bank hall and vault, which meant the completion of the reconstruction and, to a certain level, conversion of Sporck Palace. The main space of Červený Jelen pub is formerly the bank hall. The pub got its name as a reference to Count Sporck, the original owner of the buildings. He was the founder of the Czech hunting tradition and a patron of the arts. This is why you may see figures of flying red deer above the St. Hubertus' alley, Patrik Hábl's paintings in the interior, as well as such details as red antlers created by girdler Josef Ryšlavý.

Terezín (German: Theresienstadt) is a small fortress town located in the Litoměřice district. During World War II, the main fortress on the left bank of the river served as a Jewish ghetto for Nazi Germany. The small fortress on the right bank of the Ohře, located on the road to Prague, became infamous as a prison of the Prague Gestapo (it is often incorrectly stated that a concentration camp was set up here). For these purposes, the Nazis established a special railway siding that ran from the nearby Bohušovice nad Ohří railway station from the south to beyond the southern walls of the Main Fortress. During the Second World War, the Nazis used special transport trains to take the Jewish population concentrated there directly from the streets of the town to the death camps of Auschwitz, Majdanek, Treblinka, Sobibor, Chelmno and others, located in Poland and other occupied territories of Eastern Europe. Now the Terezín Memorial has been established in the premises of the Small Fortress and the building is now also a national cultural monument.
